at the end of each week. Sometimes they are just right. Sometimes they are wrong. They are your compass for how you should be making decisions. They are useful to define yourself as a writer. They are essential to keep you writing. But, with every decision, you also have to consider the cost. You're going to have to get good at decisions. You're going to have to get comfortable with the consequences of making different decisions. You have to understand that there is no perfect solution. Yes, it's good when you can make decisions that work. When you can say "This works better than that." But when you come to a decision, you're also going to be saying "I don't know if it's better than this other decision." The problem with decisions is that they are never truly good or bad. It's good when they work and when it works, it's more than good. It's great. Decisions are never really good. They are never really bad.

Decisions are always just right or wrong. But that's ok. That's ok because in the end you're always learning. So, don't waste the time thinking you have to make a decision perfectly. You're a writer. You're amazing at making decisions. That's part of the skill you're developing. The skill that allows you to tell a story. How can you make that decision? One way is to think through the pros and cons of each decision and end up with a gut feeling that whatever you do, it will be better than the other decision you could have chosen. That's it. You can't let it be perfect. You can't let it be a good decision. You have to make a decision and you have to live with the consequence. But you have to learn and that means that all the decisions you make will be wrong. This is actually a really good idea because it helps you understand that making decisions is part of the process of learning. It's an integral part of the process of learning how to be a writer. It also helps you learn that you have to learn to deal with the consequences of your decisions as well as the benefits of them
